About this course

The History MA offers a flexible structure, allowing students to design a programme that aligns with their interests. You will engage with a wide range of historical sources, from artefacts and archival documents to literature, photographs, and museum collections. The course encourages exploration of major themes that have shaped societies, including religion and revolution, gender and sexuality, race and modernity, and the evolving nature of historical truth.

Introduction

The programme provides training in advanced research methods, historiographical analysis, and theoretical approaches, incorporating insights from related disciplines. You will develop the skills necessary for independent research and critical analysis, culminating in a dissertation that allows you to investigate a historical topic of your choice in depth.

Balancing structured learning with academic flexibility, the MA offers opportunities to specialise while maintaining breadth in historical study. For those focusing on the Mediaeval period, a more structured pathway includes core modules in Latin and Palaeography, equipping students with essential skills for engaging with primary sources.

Who is this course for?

This programme will appeal to a wide range of students, including those who've recently graduated in History or a related discipline or have decided to return to university later in life. The structure of the course provides a good grounding for those intending to proceed to doctoral research.

What you'll learn

This MA draws together social, cultural, and political histories from Britain and Europe, the European empires, Asia, and the Americas from antiquity to the present day.

Teaching and assessment

How you're assessed

Most modules take the form of small seminar groups, supplemented by independent study. Most seminars are weekly two-hour sessions. Students lead discussions in class and receive guidance on further reading from the module tutor. We consider small group teaching essential to the learning and teaching experience at postgraduate level.

The HIST537 Research Assistantship and HIST500 Work-Based Placement modules use active learning through hands-on experience, either conducting research alongside a Liverpool historian, or working in a heritage institution or historical site.

The Directed Reading (HIST539) and Dissertation (HIST550) demand a higher degree of independence, with guidance and advice from a dedicated supervisor through individual tutorials.
